

China awakens

Weekly Digest

4 June 2018

– Jeromine Bertrand, CFA

If you checked the MSCI Emerging Market Index last Friday, you would have noticed the inclusion of 226 new A-Shares of Chinese companies into the benchmark. This is the first step of a very gradual introduction which will continue in September and A-shares only represent 0.4% of the index at present. While it might seem insignificant, it has triggered a wave of forced buying by passive strategies and could ultimately have a large impact on the composition of the index and investors' investment universe. In fact, if all those stocks were fully included along with additional mid cap names over time, China could come to represent 50% of the Emerging Markets of which 28% from A-Shares!

Historically, A-Shares, which are mostly listed on Shanghai and Shenzhen stock exchanges, were solely available to mainland citizens while foreign investors could only access Chinese equities via the offshore market -companies incorporated in Hong Kong ("H-Shares"), or ADRs listed in foreign markets. The Chinese government has gradually opened its onshore market with the creation of two "Stock Connect" facilities with Hong Kong and an increase in daily quotas. While managers were initially hesitant about the lack of direct ownership rights and limits on funds' repatriation, many have grown more comfortable and are now actively investing.

Why is it an important development? China's equity market has a total market cap of $12trn making it the second biggest in the world but, despite being bigger than the Euro Area, the World Index and Emerging Market Index only include the offshore market at a respective weight of 5% and 30%. While the H-Shares market represents about 700 companies and $2.8trn market cap, the Shanghai and Shenzhen markets are much deeper with more than 3500 stocks and $8.5trn market cap! The A-Shares market is arguably more attractive than the offshore one because it is more balanced and diversified across sectors and more representative of the domestic economy. The recent inclusion opens a bigger and different investment universe for investors and is a very important step towards a greater opening of the Chinese onshore equity market.

Today foreign investors' allocation to A-Shares is relatively small but it will change as the market becomes more institutionally-friendly. While the market has done very well in 2017 and is no longer cheap, valuations are still reasonable on a forward P/E basis given high growth expectations for the large caps vs their historical average. Valuations are however a lot higher at the smaller end. Investing in A-Shares isn't without risk but the market suffers from misconceptions as high volatility, poor ESG standards, trading suspension and corporate scandals grab the headlines. However, we believe this is a favourable environment for active managers which should be able to take advantage of mispricing and avoid the riskier companies.

Portfolio managers favour managers with a broader investment universe to build the China exposure because they are able to pick the best investment opportunities regardless of their listing and can invest in any stock with significant exposure to China. Where suitable, they think our portfolios already have an appropriate exposure to the Chinese domestic economy and are well positioned to take advantage of its expected growth without having a dedicated allocation to Chinese equities. However, portfolio managers will continue to review dedicated managers in the A-Shares markets that can complement existing allocations as more funds become available.
